A larger number of reported cases could undoubtedly have been classified with the group under consideration had their investigation been sufficiently complete. Nor are these cases of purely academic interest as the experience of the patients and their medical advisers attest. Cases of ectodermal defects of a partial character, such as congenital aplasia of the teeth, hypotrichosis, or even congenital absence of circumscribed patches of skin, are no longer medical curiosities. Congenital aplasia of the teeth is reported in the very earliest medical writings and numerous references to it are found in the later medical literature. True congenital hypotrichosis is distinctly more rare, and the majority of cases reported as such are undoubtedly of the alopecia totalis type, in which the fetal hair is formed but later drops out and does not grow again. The work of Waelsch.1 Pinkus 2 and...
